Schooling in Vietnam

“I was born in a large family in Vietnam, with 5 brothers and 5 sisters, my parents were illiterate. All of my sisters did not finish secondary school, because my parents believed that girls shouldn’t study much, so they just learnt how to read and write.”

--- Cu Seo Giao

Unlike students who live in the cities, students’ livelihood for those in the rural area is more difficult and they face tougher learning conditions. Most of them have to work alongside their parents after school, instead of going out or take extra lessons. As most rural parents make their living by farming which requires a lot of manual labor, children usually are required to work together with their family starting from secondary school.

Moreover, students who live outside the city face several challenges, below are some of the typical difficulties they face:

- not having enough money to continue schooling;
- lack of support from parents for their children's education because they see that learning is not important and doesn't make money;
- gender discrimination - most parents give priority to their sons for school over their daughters, because they think girls will leave the family after getting married, which does not help the family much;
- entering into marriage too early before they are mature enough for it.

Community workers in Vietnam would like to partner with charity to:

- help rural area develop by teaching them how to grow crops, raise livestock and do business effectively;
- provide scholarships to students who love to study or whose families have difficulty;
- open schools and nurture students to better equip them so to help them lift out from poverty.
