Nurturing the young people in Vietnam

Nehemiah grew up in Hoanh Nhi village in Giao Thuy, Nam Dinh, Vietnam, and is now studying as a master student in the field of leadership at Philippines. Below he shares his aspiration in nurturing the young people and the underprivileged in his home country.

The town where I grew up is a mudflat formed by the muds that were left behind by tides and it was formed over a period of a century. In the town where I grew up the people were friendly and we maintained a good relationship with one another. When I was a teenager, I wanted to become an IT programmer and earn a lot of money. I graduated from university in 2007 and at that time, not a lot of my friends had the opportunity to study there. I remember when I was in university, my parents worked very hard to pay for my tuition and living expenses. After graduation, I worked as a salesman and later as a business executive. During the time, I also took up volunteer work to serve the young people in Vietnam.

What made me decide to leave my job and pursue further education in the Philippines? Firstly, after participated in a community organization and later became a leader of their youth group, I realized I should take on formal training, in order to help me better serve the young people and the community organization. Secondly, I wanted to receive education that gives me a broader exposure and gain leadership knowledge and skills. Thirdly, I wanted to improve my English as that will help in my role as a leader of the youth group.

I am glad that I am offered a scholarship from my school and received an education grant from His Field. I have now completed six months of the programme in the Philippines and have two more years remaining to complete the degree. When I return to Vietnam, I wish to:

- help the young people to develop their values and encourage them to find out their life's purpose;
- help the young people to explore their future and help them accomplish their goals for the benefit of their own and for the community;
- inspire young people to generate ideas that will help their communities develop.

Furthermore, I would like to explore opportunities to:

- link up charity organizations with local community organizations so to develop connections between the charities and the local community workers;
- connect charity organizations with the local government to launch community development projects;
- make use of technology to introduce international charities into Vietnam and bridge them with the young people there.

Reach out to Vietnam with your love and care! Contact us if you wish to join hands with His Field to promote the well-being of those in need.
